SECTION I: REPORT

Introduction

As we move further into the 21st century, 'film' in its many forms is all around us, part of a pervading media culture that affects most aspects of the way we live. In the world of DVD, pay TV channels, the Internet and multiplexes it is hard to remember that twenty years ago popular culture was nothing like this.

The 1980s is a fascinating time because it has shaped the economy, society and culture ever since and, for good or ill, rendered what came before obsolete. For the British film industry the bulk of the decade saw cinema at an all-time low, to the point where some doubted whether it had a future in this country at all. By the end of the decade however the seeds of hope had begun to bear fruit and the start of the film revolution for audiences was upon us. Our briefing explains how this happened by looking at the films that were made, the companies that made them, and the funding system that supported them; we also look at how we saw them with the revival in cinemagoing and the advent of video.

In this first chapter we give an overview of the industry in this period. In filmic terms the decade falls into two parts – happily for those who like neatness the pivotal point for both production and exhibition is 1985. This was the year of the Films Act, which abolished the Eady Levy (a scheme that sought to put ticket money back into production) and privatised the National Film Finance Corporation. Although the effects would not be truly felt for a further 2 or 3 years it was also the year that AMC opened Britain's first multiplex cinema at The Point in Milton Keynes. What is especially interesting when reading contemporary accounts of the industry is the mixture of optimism and doom - and how they were frequently wrong about what would happen.

Britain in the 1980s

It is important to consider the background in which the film business was operating in the 1980s. Margaret Thatcher swept to power in May 1979 and, particularly after The Falklands War in 1982, started to alter the economic, political and cultural assumptions of the nation. A policy of deregulation attempted to create rapidly a free market in all industries, breaking down state monopolies and opening up new areas for competition. From being a society with an underlying philosophy based on collective solutions and an approach based largely on state management of the economy, Britain gradually moved to a culture of free enterprise. The positive reading of this emphasises the overthrow of staid and restrictive practices and new opportunities for the creation of wealth. Opponents of the Thatcher years argue that profit became the only denominator of worth, above people and quality. Translated to film the consequences of deregulation and this philosophical shift had far reaching effects.

Production

In the early part of the 1980s contemporary reports of UK production are remarkably upbeat. Nick Roddick claimed in 1985 that:

"The wrong turns of the 1960s and the failures of the 1970s, have in the mid 1980s, produced a situation in which, with adjustments and good will, British films can once more be made".

This seems surprising to the modern commentator because the number of films produced at that time were considerably lower than they are now – for instance 51 films in 1983 compared to double that figure in 2002.

The reasons for Roddick and many others' optimism were three fold. Firstly the success of CHARIOTS OF FIRE (1981) and GANDHI (1982) at the Oscars, secondly the foundation of Channel 4 and the development of the film strand Film on Four, and lastly, as Roddick intimates, the disastrous state of production at the tail end of the 1970s. After a long period where the only films that seemed to be able to be made in the UK were TV spin-offs and soft porn films like ADVENTURES OF A PLUMBER'S MATE (1978), it is understandable that some felt there were the stirrings of a Golden Age.

The achievements of David Puttnam and Richard Attenborough on the international stage and the publicity that descended after CHARIOTS OF FIRE writer Colin Welland's Oscar clarion cry of 'the British are coming' masked the lack of significant and sustainable production funding in the UK however. The twin giants of the British industry over the previous 30 or so years, Rank and Associated British (later EMI), disappeared from the production scene. Rank withdrew from the risks inherent in the production sector in 1980, reputedly after their executives supposedly disapproved of Nic Roeg's BAD TIMING (see James Park, British Cinema: The Lights that Failed, London: BT Batsford, 1990, p.38). EMI took the decision to invest in American production in order to make more money, only to lose a fortune on HONKY TONK FREEWAY (1981).

Oscar success brought some interest from the Americans in British films - an interest that had been noticeably absent since the American majors felt they had got their fingers burnt with the end of Swinging London in the late 1960s. GANDHI was largely funded by Columbia and Warner Brothers supported some of Puttnam's work (for instance CAL, 1984). Hollywood producers were also attracted by new tax breaks and the prospect of a new talent stream in the face of rather lacklustre material then emanating from the US. The future looked bright, with money flowing into Wardour Street and Pinewood. However, as the British film industry has discovered many times, this kind of success can often be fragile indeed notwithstanding the continuing lifeline of the James Bond films. The economic tide turned, as it always does, and American filmmaking became rejuvenated. As Alexander Walker puts it:

"British filmmakers who had been welcomed for bringing a diversity of entertainment to audiences stultified by formulaic Hollywood product found themselves out in the cold-again" ².

For all the hyperbole flying around at the time about film production it is an eternal truth that most non-Hollywood film industries just do not have the size and maturity to absorb failure and are very vulnerable to economic forces outside their control. In 1984 James Park was one of the few to counsel against over optimism;

"For the moment, British films are riding high. It will only take a series of failures, however to retard and damage the current healthy development in the Anglo-American relationship"³.

Sure enough, as we will see in subsequent chapters, this is what happened.

Another kind of British cinema, on a much smaller scale, also gave grounds for optimism. Through the 1970s alternative structures and filmic viewpoints began to rise from the ashes of the 1960s counterculture. Often these reflected particular regional or political interests and developed as collectives or workshops. From this background, and with the support of organisations like the BFI, filmmakers with distinctive and original visions like Derek Jarman, Peter Greenaway, Terence Davies and Sally Potter began to be able to produce a body of work. Helped by international recognition at the major film festivals their films began to create enough interest for there to be hopes that Britain might have an auteur cinema to rival France or Italy. These hopes of art house success also coincided with the advent of Film on Four, which seemed to offer the promise of a constant investment stream to smaller films tackling challenging subject matter.

So where did it all go wrong? The Americans went home and some expensive misfires on the home front sent the rickety structures of indigenous investment tumbling to the floor. The city institutions that had been wooed by the excitement of the early 1980s backed off when they realised that profits were far from guaranteed from British films. The 1985 Films Act also played its part with the abolition of the Eady Levy. The levy was far from ideal -as one twelfth of the price of a cinema ticket for a particular title went back to its producers the best returns inevitably favoured commercial box office hits. There was also a supposed quota of British films, which was widely ignored and not enforced. Similarly the National Film Finance Corporation's (NFFC) brief was to fund films that 'had a reasonable chance of commercial success', so curtailing some filmmakers ambitions. However despite these shortcomings this system did give some support to production. The NFFC was essentially privatised and remerged as British Screen, but nothing replaced Eady, leaving a vacuum at the heart of British film funding. As John Hill points out:

"It was not their abolition which presented a problem so much as the absence of any alternatives to them"⁴. When bad economic times deterred investors there was no safety net to ensure that at least some money was going into commercial production. Consequently in the late 1980s the film industry felt very isolated and vulnerable. From the passing of the Films Act in 1985 until the summer of 1990 when Mrs. Thatcher unexpected called the 'Downing Street Summit' of the great and good from the hub of the industry in Wardour Street, there did not seem to be any interest in a commercial production strategy from the government – indeed as the summit achieved little it could be said that this period continued until the foundation of the National Lottery in 1994. There was support at the margins for challenging work, but making more commercial titles that might play at the local picture house was considered to be a simple matter of market economics; if the public wanted it a demand would be created.

Exhibition

Unfortunately the truth that lay behind the industry was a lot more complicated than the monetarists might have supposed. The sad fact was that for the bulk of the 1980s relatively few people went to the cinema at all, let alone to see British films. Without the promise of audiences coming to see films on their theatrical run there is no incentive to put money into the making of films

In the picture palace heyday of the 1940s there were over one thousand million annual cinema admissions in the UK. By 1984 this had utterly collapsed by around 95% to 54 million. How had this happened?

Year	Admissions (millions)

The truth is that British society had changed very fast and cinema had been one of the main casualties of the technological and consumer revolutions. The women that had formed the core customer base turned to television for their entertainment and leisure for all but the young, footloose and fancy free became based more around the home. Television acted rather like the other labour saving devices that a newly affluent population were able to afford – instead of queuing in the rain to go into a cinema that has not been properly maintained for years, the 1950s working woman or housewife could relax at home with a variety of entertainment catering specifically to British popular tastes. Cinema tried to draw crowds back by appealing to a sense of the spectacular, which worked intermittently, and occasionally by offering something racier or harder hitting than was allowable on TV.

As admissions tumbled over the years (1956: 1,101 million, 1960: 500 million, 1968: 237.3 million: 1973: 134.2 million, 1980: 101 million) so it became impossible to sustain an exhibition sector on anything like the same scale as before. Screens closed down with great speed, often being converted into the bingo halls that replaced cinemas as a night out for many working-class women. Those that remained grew more and more dilapidated - often operating at a fraction of their true capacity. By 1984 there were just 660 cinema sites and 1271 screens in the UK. It is useful to illustrate this change with a concrete example. The city of Sheffield, with a stable population of just over half a million throughout this period, boasted 52 cinema sites in 1946, many cinemas boasting screens with over a thousand seats. By 1984 this had dwindled to just 4 sites with a total of 10 screens 5.

With this decline the choice of films available became more limited and cinemagoing stopped being part of the fabric of ordinary life. The demographic data from 1984 says it all about the industry's woes in this miserable period. The percentage of regular cinemagoers in each age range was as follows:

35+	1% ⁶

Only 21% of the over 35s ever went to the cinema at all. Cinema's base clientele was teenagers, particularly boys. The cinema was often used as a venue for hanging out, away from the domestic control implied by television, in the days before the bedroom set became de rigeur. This of course influenced the choice of films shown and cinemas were dominated by action, horror and other popular youth fare.

Some commentators of the period saw this decline as inevitable and inexorable.
Geoffrey Nowell-Smith warned in 1985 that:

"There is now an imminent danger that British Cinema as we know it, will have effectively ceased to exist within the decade".

 Source: Cinema Advertising Association.

 $^{^7}$ Geoffrey Nowell-Smith, in British Cinema Now op cit p.147

He then held out an olive branch of hope before quickly deciding to throw it away again:

"It would be wrong to discount entirely the possibility of a commercial revival. Better product, better marketing, and above all better programming and exhibition conditions in the cinemas that are left could stem the tide for a while. But there is no way the British cinema can count on more than a temporary reprieve, either for production or exhibition"⁸.

But in fact Nowell-Smith was being unduly pessimistic – although that pessimism certainly seemed advisable in 1985. Better marketing, better programming and above all better exhibition conditions did come about and audiences gradually did start to make their way back to cinemas. Rather than being the domain of bored teenagers and obsessive buffs, going to the cinema became a viable and competitive leisure option – 1984 was the nadir and thereafter there was a slow but steady rise in UK admissions up to the relatively dizzy heights of 176 million on 2002.

The reason for this turnaround is, of course, the rise in multiplexes. Although they tend to be criticised by some filmlovers for their supposed soulnessness and commerciality there is no denying that the multiplexes saved cinema as a mass experience in Britain. Patrons could after all at least be assured that cinemas were clean and warm, often offering a range of family amenities, as well as a bigger range of film titles to give the casual filmgoer more choice.

After AMC opened The Point in Milton Keynes in 1985, multiplex builds, initially from US operators, quickly gained momentum as they caught the imagination of the public. This change can be seen by comparing the sites and screens figures for 1984 and 2002. Whereas the number of sites is roughly the same, the numbers of screens has grown from 1271 to 3258 ⁹. By the end of the 1980s 29 multiplexes with 285 screens had opened across the UK.

The rise of the out of town multiplexes did cause some cinema closures – the cost of restoring the condition of some high street sites to compete was just too much, although some cinemas entered the spirit of things by smartening themselves up and adding a few more screens. In the building frenzy some places became unsustainably over-screened too quickly, but over time natural levels settled that could support good audiences. Generally, however the multiplex experience greatly increased the potential pool of customers.

Now that cinema offered a leisure space that was acceptable to more people the industry was in a position to stimulate demand. As the media changed, film marketing changed with it. Rather than be a niche product selling itself through specialist magazines, film began to fill a more mainstream position in newspapers and television. Film releases were advertised through TV commercials, and stories around high profile films and film stars moved from the weekly review and the gossip columns to front-page news. This process happened gradually through the 1980s with films like E.T, FATAL ATTRACTION, CROCODILE DUNDEE and BATMAN. Film culture started to move towards the all-pervading experience that it is today. It is ironic that the widespread optimism around production at the beginning of the decade proved as misplaced as the gloomy consensus about the future of cinemagoing. For all this woe, by the end of 1989 cinema in Britain had survived and was in a good position to bring in new audiences. Rather than be compromised by new ways to see films, the industry gained strength from change.

TV and Film

While the British film industry was in the doldrums the British broadcasting industry was at the peak of its power. The 1980s saw a greater convergence of these once very separate media and raised a range of debates about the business and aesthetics of moving image culture in Britain. TV money kept British films going when investment ran dry but did this kill off spectacle and the cinematic imagination? Should they have stumped up even more cash? Some argued that film's windfall was at the expense of TV drama and TV was the medium damaged by this period.

In the 1960s and 1970s film and television were very much separate entities; this separation underlined formally by distinct union agreements for crew, and by transmission rules that meant feature films could not be shown on TV until 3 years after theatrical release. In such a climate there was little incentive for broadcasters to invest in film production, especially when the audiences that watched local product on the small screen in their millions had proved so reluctant to leave their home to see British films at high street cinemas. The big beasts of Wardour Street applied political pressure to get what they considered to be a fair share of the financial spoils. They argued that television got a huge boost from film in its transmission of cinema titles and that the presence of a duopoly (BBC and ITV) ensured that they paid well under the odds for the privilege.

John Hill contends that the relationship was indirectly changed for good by the Annan report on broadcasting in 197710. Although Annan explicitly rejected calls for TV companies to be forced to directly contribute to film production, his calls for the establishment of a fourth, independent TV station opened the doors for changes in policy and practice. When Channel 4 finally started broadcasting in November 1982 their Chief Executive, Jeremy Isaacs, prioritised investment in feature film, although initially he envisaged theatrical screenings abroad and TV premieres in the UK, because of the regulatory restrictions¹¹. Once agreements had been reached with the unions and the Cinema Exhibitors' Association however, theatrical releases could go ahead with a relatively speedy TV screening to follow to recoup some of the investment. The full story of Film on Four as a company can be found elsewhere in this briefing but here we will concentrate on its role in the transformation of film and television into partners in the UK.

Shooting began on Film on Four's first productions even before its parent channel had first aired. Between 1982 and 1989 134 films were made with Channel 4 money, and this cash offered a much-needed lifeline to a film industry that had appeared to be in an inexorable decline. One of the characteristics of Channel 4's film success was their clever use of funding and production partners to ensure that projects got made. These partners included the National Film Finance Corporation and its successor British Screen, as well as a vast array of independent producers and foreign sales agents. The producers ranged from established outfits such as David Puttnam's company Enigma and Goldcrest, to micro companies based in the regions (for instance Amber in Newcastle), for the policy of partnership did not just apply to the more mainstream, higher budget fare. In addition to Film on Four, Channel 4 funded more experimental feature work (including work by Derek Jarman and Sally Potter) through their Department of Independent Film and Video, which worked with the funding opportunities available through the BFI Production Board and the workshop agreements made with various filmmaking collectives.

Often the Channel 4 funding was actually quite low in percentage terms, even for some titles commonly associated with Film on Four – for instance only 8% of THE COMPANY OF WOLVES (1984), 20% of DANCE WITH A STRANGER (1984), and 16% of PRICK UP YOUR EARS (1987)¹². Later in the channel's career some producers felt disgruntled at Channel 4's claims of credit for a title's success from a fairly small financial outlay, but in the 1980s most producers were glad of the deal, both for the money and for the guaranteed TV screenings and sales.

The success of Film on Four, and its prolific output, set a model for the way in which film and TV could co-operate. The relative success of some of the titles inspired the more established broadcasters to think about the potential of feature film. Towards the middle of the 1980s ITV companies began to put money into British films. Thames TV through their Euston Films division, which had long supplied quality thrillers for TV, began to fund the occasional theatrical feature. Central TV, the Midlands franchise, owned the production company Zenith for a while and in doing so helped to fund such era defining features as Alex Cox's SID AND NANCY (1986) and Stephen Frears' THE HIT (1984). The biggest of the companies, Granada, set up a films division in 1987 and had an early big hit with Jim Sheridan's Oscar-winning MY LEFT FOOT (1989), while LWT, TVS and Scottish TV also put money into individual projects.

The BBC was slower to act. There were good reasons for this. For the previous 20-30 years the BBC was the most important producer of film in the UK - it was just that the films were shown on television and not in cinemas. On the small screen Ken Loach, Mike Leigh, Alan Clarke, and others could be supported in making challenging work that could easily access millions; why then would the corporation want to put money into the riskier, less popular cinema market? As the deregulation of the Thatcher years continued the BBC found its old practices and philosophies under political and economic pressure. The single play system that had sustained filmmaking in Britain for so long began to fall apart as costs rose and ratings fell, culminating in the axing of the main single drama strand, PLAY FOR TODAY, in 1984. TV talent was also beginning to lament the short shelf life of their work. One of the greatest TV writers, Alan Bennett, in 1984 said that:

"A BBC television film has no history. It is an incident, with luck an occasion, the bait for the writer a nationwide audience and his work a topic of general discussion the next day"¹³.

He goes on to predict with remarkable prescience that a forthcoming multichannel environment would change all this and:

"the single play or TV film will be as rare on television here as it is in America".

And so it came to pass.

Production executives and creative talent then began to note that although feature films rarely reached the numbers of people on initial release that TV screenings did, they did have a much longer shelf life and brought in revenue. The video revolution of the early 1980s meant that films could go on making money long after their original release, in a large number of different territories. The theatrical release was a vital factor in this however as the initial publicity and reviews established and branded the property and created value for future sales.

The BBC's initial forays into theatrical features were merely through the prepurchase of transmission rights by the Acquisitions Department. However in 1988 the Drama department started to invest in films with a view to a theatrical release – thus giving birth to BBC Films, ultimately a sales, rights and production arm for filmed fiction for cinema and TV screens.

By the end of the decade television was keeping British cinema alive – in 1989 49% of films produced here had some British television investment – but the industry's

Film and television drama share some obvious similarities in their visual grammar and in their narrative construction. Their main difference of course is in the way that they are consumed. Cinema implies a viewing experience in an auditorium with others, offering no distractions and a huge screen. Television is in the home and thus much more part of the weft and weave of everyday life. This distinction has a number of consequences in the way the two media are perceived; it makes television much more of a political hot potato because of its ability to influence large numbers of people, but paradoxically also has meant that television has been less regarded as an art form, being thought of as far more transitory and thus less weighty. The nature of the small screen (and the frequently poor technical reception until recently) meant that the viewer was not confronted with the same visual beauty that was possible at the cinema. This aesthetic disadvantage, the supposed inability to harness the power of the image, was adjudged in the 1980s to make television inevitably the poor relation of cinema. For instance Mamoun Hassan (formerly Head of the BFI Production Board and of the National Film Finance Corporation) said in 1984 that:

"The two media, both for the makers and for the audience, are tuned to different harmonics. Television is at its best dealing with concepts, explaining and describing; cinema is at its best when it concerns itself with the ineffable, with that which cannot be expressed" ¹⁴.

Plainly there is some truth in this – APOCALYPSE NOW works best in the cinema, CORONATION STREET can only work as television. However there is a large middle ground where the aesthetics are not as clear-cut. The idea of television values as intrinsically drab and concerned with talking heads in darkened rooms is distinctly dubious –the two great TV series of the mid 1980s, THE SINGING DETECTIVE (BBC 1986) and EDGE OF DARKNESS (BBC 1985) are full of visual invention and excitement. What is undeniable is that in the 1980s a lot of the personnel who became involved in feature film had worked in television, and were influenced by its culture.

Alan Parker (Chairman of the UK Film Council from 1999-2004, and so in charge of the body with the most influence on the current UK film industry) made a highly polemical TV programme called THE TURNIP

¹⁴ Mamoun Hassan in 'British Cinema: Life before Death on Television' edited by Penelope Houston in Sight and Sound Vol.53 No.2 Spring 1984

HEAD'S GUIDE TO THE BRITISH CINEMA in 1986, which castigated the supposedly highbrow and parochial nature of British cinema at the time. Parker argued for a cinema that was:

"a place where our world becomes larger than us, where life isn't reduced to the size of a box in the living room"15.

The implication in Parker's polemic is that the TV funded films made in the 1980s were not 'real' cinema, but visually uninteresting and unappealing to the general viewer - offering them nothing that they could not get in their front room. It is worth thinking about whether this accusation is really true. Certainly established British visual stylists like Ken Russell and Nicolas Roeg did not receive funding from Film on Four and the limited budgets available from TV sources invariably must have affected the scope of films in terms of effects, location and spectacle. However while many of the films were intimate pieces set in contemporary Britain there was still room for a fantasy in THE COMPANY OF WOLVES, or the impressionist work of Derek Jarman and Terence Davies. It is also worth remembering the British film industry never has been exactly awash with money for elaborate spectacle and that the bigger budget boom that CHARIOTS OF FIRE instigated proved unsustainable.

That said, there was a widespread feeling that the dominance of television money was creating a particular kind of cinema in Britain, one linked to the frequent preoccupations of television - the state of the nation, reflection on the tensions in British society and so on. In contrast to the international scope of say, Puttnam's films, many could be perceived as inward looking and not obviously accessible to outlets outside the UK.

But while filmmakers like Parker, and traditional critics like Penelope Houston¹⁶, worried that TV investment was demeaning cinema, perhaps the real problem lay elsewhere. The rush to put money into theatrical features proved to be the death knell for original single drama on British television, once its defining artistic achievement. Once companies began investing in films with a theatrical release they discovered that they had a longer shelf life through ancillary formats, could be sold in foreign markets and thus make more money. Over time this began to influence the type of films being made, so they began to be aimed to appeal more to a non-domestic market. Broadcasters by this time had found the single TV film a difficult sell in the new competitive market place, being expensive and lacking an established, returning audience familiar with the product.

Ultimately maybe television was the medium that lost out most from convergence in Britain. The end of the single play and challenging drama as a significant and consistent force, and the large talent base it nurtured still leaves something of a cultural void. As John Caughie warned:

"The logic of convergence may lose sight of the specific and divergent possibilities of a national cinema and a national television"17.

And as Martin McLoone said the changes of the 1980s led to:

"...a view of the two media which has tended to favour cinema ahead of television, based on a set of aesthetic and cultural assumptions which, especially in Britain, have actually stymied the aesthetic development of television fiction" 18.

Video

The growth of video into an allencompassing leisure activity is one of the most remarkable aspects of life in Britain in the 1980s. In 1980 just 2% of households had a video recorder – by 1984 this had expanded to 33% and growth continued throughout the decade to reach 70% of all homes by 1989.

biggest intended market was the United States, it was Britain that proved to be the world leader in consuming the new media with a penetration rate of 38% by the mid '80s compared to 20% in the US.

The reasons for Britain's wholehearted embrace of the video revolution are varied. A 1985 article in Film Comment cites as factors the relative strength of British television, which made time-shifted recordings of TV programmes an attractive option, and also the national trend at the time to rent electronic equipment, making acquiring VCRs a cheaper proposition¹⁹.

As we have seen the 1980s was a catastrophic period for cinema admissions and video was widely blamed for exacerbating this trend. However once cinemas concentrated on becoming more welcoming environments the British public proved willing to try the cinema experience once more. The popularity of video actually signalled that there was a big interest in film entertainment – just that there were different ways to consume it. Viewing at home held a number of attractions – you had convenience about when you could view, you did not need to hire babysitters, and you could stop the film anytime it was necessary. It is also worth remembering that video in this period was seen as a largely working class activity – as was also the case with film in the periods of huge cinema admissions in the 1940s. The improvements in living conditions in the intervening 40 years (not too mention more flexible mores) made staying in a much more welcome option in the 1980s and video was cheap, convenient and enjoyable. Now you didn't need to head for The Roxy to see your boyfriend or keep from hypothermia.

Research at the time showed that video and cinemagoing complemented each other. The Broadcasting Research Unit found that:

"VCR owners are not less frequent filmgoers than other sections of the population"²⁰.

The nature of video also changed the way we watch films. For the first time it became possible to have multiple viewings of favourite titles when we chose, rather than rely on TV networks or cinema managers. The close viewings that were enabled by video, with rewind and fast-forward allowing us to replay scenes, made people more aware of film language. Rental also meant that ordinary people could access a wide range of material, even in isolated locations.

20 Ibid. The article interviewed David Docherty of the Broadcasting Research Unit.

Rental video was introduced to the UK by Intervision in 1979. To start with there were 40 official dealers and it cost £5.95 to rent a title for one night. Just one year later there were upwards of 120 dealers and more competitive pricing. At first the major US distributors saw video as a home recording device and hesitated before committing capital, so the market belonged to independent dealers that had grown out of music publishing companies and audio manufacturers. Woolworth and WH Smith also began video clubs on their premises, with a one off membership fee and a nightly rental charge. Distributors began to provide rental dealers with video packages that included several copies of the film, display cases and advertising materials.

The expansion of the video business was complicated by the 'format wars' between VHS, developed by JVC and Matshusita, and Sony's Betamax. Betamax was considered technically superior but VHS was able to access more available titles and was cheaper earlier, thus eventually triumphing over its rival. In Britain this battle of the VCRs meant that for a while shops and rental libraries were offering some of the same titles on different formats - not the most simple or cost effective method of tapping into the obvious consumer demand for the technology. After their initial terror at what they considered to be potentially disastrous competition, the US major studios got involved one by one in the market. They came to realise that an additional consumer base for their products was developing and finally saw the economic sense in prolonging interest in their product by rental and sell-though video. In fact the studios could develop a lucrative revenue stream by publishing their back catalogue on video. The independents that had dominated the market in the beginning were gradually priced out by the studios, unable to compete with the cost of title acquisition. Ironically by the end of the decade the popularity of video contributed to a renaissance in exhibition. The only way cinemas could compete with video was to create a new cinema experience and so the age of the multiplex began.

"Video Nasties" & Regulation

During the 1970s cinemas were dominated by blockbuster releases from the major studios. Films like STAR WARS (1977) and SUPERMAN (1978) played for weeks at the severely depleted number of local cinemas, and as a result independent films and art movies had little avenue for release. When video first began to make an impact at the beginning of the decade it was those films that were an alternative to the mainstream that benefited the most from release. The major studios were at first resistant to the new medium seeing it as threat rather than something to be used to boost profits. As has often been the case with new technologies, pornography and other exploitation genres led demand. The early video hits in Britain were B-movies and foreign horror releases (for instance Sam Raimi's THE EVIL DEAD, 1982) that could not be seen in many cinemas. In the early days the whole video industry was unregulated and corner shops could rent out any video title without the need for a certificate or a licence. Video piracy was also rife and the majors lost our considerably to this as the public embraced video in their droves.

The beginnings of video caught regulators off-guard leading to something of a censorship free environment. The popularity of video with teenagers meant that a lot of material that might be considered unsuitable was being viewed in homes. The press seized on some court cases where watching violent videos was entered as a mitigating factor in the committing of a crime. Sometimes, however, this may have been a spurious tactic as other factors such as addiction or abuse may have been more important² There were mass seizures of videos under the Obscene Publications Act, some perhaps justified and some perhaps less so, and a list was drawn up of banned titles by the director of Public Prosecutions - dubbed the DPP's "Big 60" by the industry. The Conservative Government, facing reelection, decided it was time to tackle the issue and formed an alliance with the increasingly powerful National Viewers & Listeners Association led since the 1960s by Mary Whitehouse. A public enquiry into the need for legislation was set up despite alternatives presented by the industry for self-regulation. The Video Recordings Act, sponsored by Conservative MP Graham Bright, was passed in 1984, giving responsibility for the classification of all videos to the British Board of Film Censors. The consumption of video in the home has meant that, like television, it faces more political pressure than film in cinemas. A number of commentators²² have pointed out that 'moral panics' of the kind that engulfed video in the early 1980s, often seem to hinge on the availability of 'unsuitable' material to working-class audiences – rather less fuss is made about similar material deemed only to appeal to an educated elite, for instance in foreign language films.

"Censorship rules on videos have relaxed greatly in the last five years but rules regarding video still remain stricter than for cinema screenings"23.

The inexorable rise of video changed the film industry forever, but rather than being the final nail in the coffin as some anticipated, it actually helped to give film as entertainment a new life. The new ways to see the material that video gave to the audience led to the ubiquity of film culture

LEADING COMPANIES

Merchant Ivory

During the 1980s most international audiences would probably have identified Merchant Ivory as the best-known British film company, and their productions as the films that most defined British cinema of the era. This is ironic as the company is not in any real sense British, run as it has been by an Indian, Ismail Merchant, and an American, James Ivory. The third partner, screenwriter Ruth Prawer Jhabvala, was educated in England but was born in Germany and has spent her adult life in India and the US. The company has long had a London production office but their headquarters is in New York, where the founders resided. Also, although often identified with the 1980s, the company was actually formed as long ago as 1961 and is still going strong, although it remains to be seen if it will continue following Merchant's death in 2005. The 1980s however was the period in which their commercial fortunes were at their height and when they came to be identified with a particularly British aesthetic.

In its earlier years Merchant Ivory had made some acclaimed, low profile films largely based in either India or the US, such as SHAKESPEARE WALLAH (1965) and ROSELAND (1977). Indeed if anything the company was known as an observer of Indian society for a western audience rather than for any particular interest in Britishness. However in 1978 they used British funding for their adaptation of Henry James's THE EUROPEANS, and this proved to be indicative of things to come.

The company's commercial fortunes began to turn due to their second film of the 1980s HEAT AND DUST (1982), based on Jhabvala's own novel. In comparing the position of two womens' experiences of India in the 1980s and 1920s, the film was in some senses on very familiar ground. However the women were British and the film's emphasis on their feelings of 'otherness' as representatives of the colonial power affirmed its status as a 'British' film. HEAT AND DUST was also significantly British in financial as well as cultural terms with funding coming from Channel 4, Rank and other sources. The making of the film however illustrated to the company the endemic problems in British film funding as financing fell through in mid-shoot, threatening to bankrupt the company. Only an investment of private money from the Rothschild banking dynasty enabled the picture to be completed on a budget of £1.1 million but it opened to good reviews and respectable business.

After another James adaptation, THE BOSTONIANS (1984), did good commercial business with some British backing, the team turned their attentions to British literary sources with a version of E.M. Forster's novel A ROOM WITH A VIEW (1984). In North America this grossed $24m of its $60 million worldwide gross, a highly impressive profit on a $3 million budget. This film remains the high water mark of Merchant Ivory's commercial success and also served to brand them as the foremost purveyors of what quickly came to be known as 'heritage cinema'. The elements that make up A ROOM WITH A VIEW - sunny Tuscan hillsides and English stately homes, genteel maiden aunts, long flowing dresses and cricket whites - have come to symbolise the company's work and the heritage genre, when in fact the film is considerably lighter in tone than most Merchant Ivory titles.

After this success there was industry pressure to capitalise on it by business expansion and mainstream investment but Merchant resisted. He said that:

"None of (the proposals) had any links to our methods of moviemaking. And we didn't want to become flavour of the month"²⁴.

Given the high profile failures of Goldcrest, Palace et al (that are covered on later pages) this could well have been a wise move. Instead of going for big budget spectaculars Merchant Ivory carried on making the films that interested them, in a style that suited their talents. Although they have made contemporary tales (LE DIVORCE, 2003) and biopics (SURVIVING PICASSO, 1996) the films that have resonated most with audiences have been classic literary adaptations in the mould of A ROOM WITH A VIEW, although of a rather more sombre tone. Their adaptations of HOWARD'S END (1992) and THE REMAINS OF THE DAY (1993) were perhaps their best received films but are essentially a development of a style that they established in the 1980s.

The importance of Merchant Ivory to British cinema is two-fold; its impact on exhibition structures; and on the perception of British film culture by the external audience.

The enormous success of A ROOM WITH A VIEW in particular, and the Merchant Ivory oeuvre in general with audiences, showed that seemingly highbrow entertainment could be financially profitable. At a time when the bulk of the cinema audience was teenage boys, this illustrated that older, wealthier patrons were willing to turn up at cinemas if there was material that appealed to them. Previously the assumption was that profits could only be delivered consistently by supplying the core youth audience with horror, comedy and action spectaculars. Whereas this young audience, anxious to be free of parental constraints, were also prepared to put up with the rapidly deteriorating physical environments of cinemas – older people were not.

The revelation that older people, particularly affluent ones, could be enticed back to screens has proved vital to both exhibitors and producers all over the world, opening up the possibility that specialised art house cinemas could tap into more mature audiences. Investors could see that cinemas that catered for this audience and their tastes could deliver audiences and profits. In this way a precarious, but surviving, art house network has been able to develop. In the UK this has sometimes been with the help of subsidies by the BFI and other organisations, but some cinemas like the Renoir in London's Bloomsbury area and Oxford's Phoenix Picturehouse have survived without subsidy by responding particularly to this audience.

The figures prove the extent of this change in audience. In 1984 only 1% of over 35 year olds were regular cinemagoers and a mere 21% ever went all (in contrast to 73% of 7-14 year olds). Twenty years after A ROOM WITH A VIEW a seismic shift in exhibition in the UK had taken place – by 2002 17% of over 35s were regular visitors to cinemas and 74% went at least sometimes.

Merchant Ivory films did extremely good business in North America and Europe, better in fact than in the UK. Similarly while critics in those territories were positive, or at least respectful, notices in Britain were often hostile. George Perry, for instance, described MAURICE (1987) as 'a cold, shallow, dated exercise' and Alan Hollinghurst called it 'deplorably wellmade' 25. The general feeling was that the films were far too self-consciously 'tasteful' and eschewed meaning for sumptuous décor and period detail. This may well be unfair but possibly sprang from the company's outsider view on British culture. What might seem exotic and interesting to a foreign audience might seem either too familiar or too much of a misrepresentation to audiences more familiar with that culture.

Such carping was still evident in some obituaries following Ismail Merchant's death in May 2005. However Merchant Ivory's longevity as a company and their ability to continue making the films that interest them offer a salutary lesson to the British film industry, beset as it traditionally has been by a cycle of boom and bust. Merchant's personal energy and commitment to keeping a British base were important in raising British production out of its early 80s mire and he deserves much credit for that.

HandMade Films

It was a tough job trying to produce British films regularly in the 1980s but HandMade, a company set up for a one-off dabble in the industry to produce a film a millionaire fancied seeing, managed to do just that. Or rather they managed to do that, with mixed but occasionally brilliant results, for over ten years until with the aching familiarity of the British Film Industry, it all went very, very wrong.

In 1978 EMI withdrew support for the Monty Python team's irreverent religious satire LIFE OF BRIAN (1979). Former Beatle George Harrison, a big fan of the comedy team, stepped in with his American business manager Denis O'Brien to fund the project and the film became a surprise big hit (the 4th biggest film at the UK Box Office in 1980). This inspired a further Python related project, Terry Gilliam's fantasy TIME BANDITS (1987), which also did reasonably well with both audiences and critics.

From then on the company quickly expanded into a serious production outfit funding a range of titles from a gentle Michael Palin comedy -THE MISSIONARY (1981) - to a tough women's prison drama -SCRUBBERS (1982). Although O'Brien, who dominated the company, fell out with the Pythons, HandMade showed a canny knack for picking up projects that had run aground at other companies and making them hits. A classic example of this is the seminal gangland thriller THE LONG GOOD FRIDAY (1979), abandoned by EMI in production. They were also adept at memorable successes from material that appeared to be very uncommercial, notably Neil Jordan's dark thriller MONA LISA (1985), Alan Bennett's rationing comedy A PRIVATE FUNCTION (1984), and perhaps the most unlikely and most durable of all, sleeper cult comedy WITHNAIL AND I (1986).

The obverse side of these artistic triumphs were some hard business practices that in many ways set the precedent for the way the British industry works today. However the way HandMade operated also sowed the seeds for its future downfall. Financial risks were minimised by an early use of completion bonds and pre-sales. HandMade had dabbled in distribution unsuccessfully in 1981-2 but withdrew when they could not get a reasonable slate of titles together. Subsequently they sold distribution rights to their productions around the world while the films were still being made. Denis O'Brien forced these buyers into very tough deals – fine when the titles were selling to customers but when expensive failures like WATER (1985) and the infamous Madonna/Sean Penn vehicle SHANGHAI SURPRISE (1986) played to empty houses the well of goodwill towards the company had run dry and customers for pre-sales could no longer be found.

In 1988 the company celebrated its tenyear anniversary. At the time HandMade was lauded as a survivor that had established itself as a core part of the British industry – almost immediately afterwards, however, the whole enterprise began to unravel. The core of the problem was the differing aims of O'Brien and Harrison. Their complex relationship is detailed in Robert Sellars excellent recent chronicle of the company's rise and fall Always Look on the Bright Side of Life (Metro Publishing 2003). The ambitions of O'Brien clashed with Harrison's laid-back approach. O'Brien was frequently accused by filmmakers of interfering in the creative process and relentlessly pushed for extra revenue opportunities. This was particularly the case with his attempts to crack the American market. Harrison by contrast was much more relaxed, saying "I'm not into that trip of being a big shot" 26 and "I just hope that Denis doesn't turn out to be a madman....It's good that he's going for it in some ways though. I would have been content just to do LIFE OF BRIAN and TIME BANDITS – much happier just doing comedies" 27. Harrison's unease was manifested a month after the anniversary celebrations in October 1988 when, without warning, the former Beatle sacked most of the company's staff and radically scaled back operations. Film choices in the latter days were, as Sellars describes, often bizarre, but the company did score one last, back to their roots, final hit in the broad British comedy NUNS ON THE RUN (1990), featuring Eric Idle. A dispute between Palace (the film's UK distributors) and HandMade however meant that no money was forthcoming for the ailing company.

The end of HandMade was bloody and protracted. According to Sellars it emerged that O'Brien had been guaranteeing projects with Harrison's millions while protecting his own burgeoning fortunes, frequently borrowing to pay off loans elsewhere. Sellars claims that Harrison lost $25 million. Meanwhile HandMade had been wound up and sold to Paragon Entertainment in 1994 after 3 years of being dormant. The name was still used for some projects and it was sold again to Equator in 1999.

Robert Sellars, Always Look on the Bright Side of Life (London: Metro Publishing, 2003) p.227
 'HandMade Man' interview with Elaine Dutka in Film Comment, May/June 1988 Vol.24 No.3 pp.22-27

HandMade had a considerable impact on 1980s British cinema – good films were made and became successful and many of them are iconic visions of the decade. However the final failure of HandMade, spectacular though it was, is entirely in keeping with the endemic problems that have always beset the British film industry. A desire by O'Brien to up the ante and crack the US markets spelt the death knell for the company and muddied the creative waters. This is essentially the story of many British companies who make an initial impact but are unable to absorb expensive failure. Sellars quotes the whistle-blowing company accountant John Reiss as saying:

"It must have been a massive financial disaster. It was a private business and the ownership of it and the films were spread all over the place. People talk about HandMade, but HandMade didn't exist as such, it was a network of partnerships, distribution companies and so on. If it had been HandMade plc and everything had gone into one company, it would have collapsed financially massively long before" 28.

The British film business proved once again that it is not a place to make a quick buck but MONA LISA, THE LONG GOOD FRIDAY, WITHNAIL AND I, and of course LIFE OF BRIAN, continue to attest to the importance of HandMade.

BFI Production Board

British cinema of the 1980s is not just memorable for the brilliant, if brief, moments of enterprise, commercial success against the odds, and the cult hits. It was also a period in which Britain developed a distinctive alternative cinema that pushed the boundaries of cinematic expression and allowed new voices to be heard. Leading this movement was the British Film Institute's Production Board. The Board created a system of public funding that could support 'difficult' work, and allowed some talented filmmakers of the period to build a career away from the strictures of the mainstream.

In the 1950s an Experimental Film Fund was set up, producing occasional, but frequently influential, short films and helping to launch the careers of talents as diverse as Karel Reisz and Ken Russell. In 1966 the BFI Production Board was founded to produce films under the direct auspices of the Institute. From 1975 under Peter Sainsbury the board balanced a range of production projects, funded workshops and used the BFI's distribution and exhibition apparatus to support particular creative stances. The deal he made with Channel 4 in 1982 to screen and help fund the board's films provided an opportunity to access a wider audience.

Colin McCabe took over as Head of the Board in 1985 and concentrated much of the focus on art cinema feature projects, capitalising on the earlier surprise success of the Peter Greenaway film THE DRAUGHTSMAN'S CONTRACT in 1982. Helped by match funding by Channel 4, the McCabe era developed a British auteur cinema through increasing support for directors like Derek Jarman and Terence Davies, allowing them to develop more ambitious projects such as CARAVAGGIO (1986) and DISTANT VOICES, STILL LIVES (1988).

In this way an alternative structure to the increasingly restricted practices of Wardour Street was formed. The most fruitful and cohesive spell in the board's history was in the 1980s when its different activities combined to shake up the inertia of a failing commercial industry and raise new possibilities for British filmmaking. Combined with the work at Film Four the features produced by the board (not to mention the large number of shorts and backing for regional collectives, such as the Amber Workshop in Newcastle) kept up a significant profile for the UK within world cinema. As the then BFI Director Anthony Smith put it:

"The dividing line between us and the wider industry lies in our relationship with the filmmaker. With us at the end of the day, the filmmaker's wishes are paramount. That is why the Production Board has to exist"29.

When UK production revived in the 1990s it was informed by some of the thinking of the Board in this period – so much so that BFI Production became rather overtaken by events and the incoming Labour government decided to move government support to more commercial structures and projects. The Board was closed in 1998 and funding transferred to the Film Council on its inception in 2000.

The success of some of the Production Board's ventures in the 1980s was however as much in spite of, as because of, its structure and status. Filmmaking by committee can be a soul-destroying process, particularly when the board, who made the decisions and could veto Sainsbury's and McCabe's plans, were split by politics, aesthetics and background. Many of the producers and academics represented on the Board considered that its purpose was to reject the narrative and formal norms of mainstream cinema. Other groups saw its main aim as supporting radical politics and excluded social groups. The ACTT union saw its purpose as the protection of its membership – although rates were dropped for experimental work this agreement broke down over Channel 4's financial contributions to the scheme.

²⁹ Quoted in 'Which way for the Film Board?' by Julian Petley, AIP and Co. No.64 March 1985 pp.16-17

What was often left out of these disputes was the audience and the Production Board could certainly be accused at times of selfindulgence and wilful obscurantism. Also films like DOLL'S EYE (1982 dir. Jan Worth) deliberately set out to alienate audiences on some levels. The chairs of the Board in this period, seasoned TV executives Jeremy Isaacs and Verity Lambert, fought against this tendency along with Sainsbury (in the latter part of his spell at least) and McCabe. Isaacs accused some board members and the filmmakers they championed as wanting:

"A cinema which seeks not to involve the spectator in an experience but to distance him from the film before throwing down the gauntlet by saying:

"I hope the BFI Production Board continues to encourage experiment in filmmaking for the greater pleasure of spectators in the cinema and viewers on TV. And I hope they will discourage the purveyors of text "30.

Largely this happened and at least some films from the Board did try to challenge an audience by first engaging with them. The Production Board was also one of the few places where groups ignored by the mainstream, notably women, black people and gays and lesbians, could find a voice. Indeed BURNING AN ILLUSION (1981 dir. Menelik Shabazz) and YOUNG SOUL REBELS (1991 dir. Isaac Julien) remain among the most recent feature films made in the UK by Afro-Caribbean directors. One reason why the more obscurist factions lost out in the political struggles over the Board was that they had long complained that if the films were shown properly an audience would respond to them. The advent of Channel 4, who showed this work (ironically under the control of Isaacs), proved that the response was usually the off button.

However for all its occasional indulgence the Board had a hugely important role in developing British film culture. John Hill has pointed out that its work created, perhaps for the first time, a British art cinema that could be compared to those in Europe ³¹. The structures installed since the demise of the Board through organisations like the UK Film Council have supported auteurs like Lynne Ramsay but have not presented a cohesive and concerted case for challenging work in the same kind of way, and it could be argued that moving image culture in this country is the poorer for this. Interestingly in the mid 1980s American critic B.Ruby Rich wrote a wistful paen to the board, claiming that its structures and ideas could be successfully transposed to the US by claiming that: "Despite all its problems the British model is still well worth emulating"32.

While this never happened in formal terms the rise of the American independent film, creating almost an alternative industry, has elements of the Production Board ethos. Likewise the opening up of different voices and subjects, such as Black and Gay Cinema, in the US owes something to the work that Sainsbury, McCabe and others encouraged at the BFI.

Channel Four

At the beginning of the 1980s, with the television industry buoyant enough to contemplate a fourth channel, the film industry was at its lowest ebb. Filmmakers were finding it hard to raise the capital to fund their projects whilst television companies prospered. Film producers argued that television bought their films too cheaply while the cinema exhibitors insisted that films should not be shown on television until three years after their cinematic release. TV companies argued that this was too restrictive for any real investment in film production to be viable. Into this situation the newly formed Channel Four under the leadership of Jeremy Isaacs sought to pay something back, to create its own library of feature films, to nurture new talents and to forge greater links between the two industries.

Part of the statutory remit of the fourth channel was to cater for tastes not covered by ITV and to encourage experiment and innovation. In keeping with its obligations the drama department developed a new British soap, BROOKSIDE (1982 – 2003), and established a slot called FILM ON FOUR to showcase new work. Instead of buying in feature films the channel would commission its own TV films and buy in drama serials from overseas. All commissioned drama was to be produced to feature film standards. The commissioning editor David Rose, a former BBC drama producer for Z CARS and PLAY FOR TODAY had a budget of £6 million with a view to allocating £300,000 to each project, sometimes as the sole funder and sometimes as a co-producer with television rights.

The first season of FILM ON FOUR in 1982 - 83 was basically made up of TV drama, which would not have played well to cinema audiences but which found an appreciative television following. It consisted of films like; WALTER, PTANG YANG KIPPERBANG, PRAYING MANTIS and EXPERIENCE PREFERRED BUT NOT ESSENTIAL. By the second season Channel Four had negotiated a deal with the Cinema Exhibitors Association that allowed them to show recent films that had ended their cinematic run, so long as the budget was less than £1.25 million. This meant that films such as ANGEL and THE DRAUGHTSMAN'S CONTRACT could be shown on television before the end of the three-year embargo and ensured the channel's continued investment in British features.

As well as co-producing films with other British companies, including Goldcrest and Merchant Ivory, the company invested in foreign language titles (for instance Theo Angelopoulos's LANDSCAPE IN THE MIST (1988) and American independent films (such as Gregory Nava's EL NORTE, 1983). Even if much of the output was of minority interest, there is no denying that Film Four was responsible for many box office and critical successes. One such film was MY BEAUTIFUL LAUNDRETTE (1985).

MY BEAUTIFUL LAUNDRETTE is a classic example of how a 1980s Channel Four film came about. In 1984 the assistant commissioning editor of Film Four, Karin Bamborough, commissioned a script from young and fashionable playwright Hanif Kureishi. He came back with a first draft screenplay for MY BEAUTIFUL LAUNDRETTE but Film Four had no budget left for the year to make it. Kureishi gave the script to the director Stephen Frears. Frears, who had made the film WALTER, which had screened on Channel Four's opening night, was keen to direct and asked Sarah Radclyffe and Tim Bevan at the newly founded Working Title to produce it. Everyone was keen for Channel Four to be involved, as Kureishi puts it:

"For me Film On Four had taken over from the BBC's Play For Today in presenting serious contemporary drama on TV to a wide audience" 33.

Frears and Bevan met with Channel Four with a production plan mapped out and a projected budget of just £1million. Another film had folded and the channel needed to fill the gap and so gave the go ahead, provided the production started immediately. The film came in on schedule and within budget. Playing at various festivals it gained some excellent reviews and a strong word of mouth following amongst audiences. It became obvious that the film would play well in cinemas and the theatrical rights were sold to the distributor and cinema owner Mainline. MY BEAUTIFUL LAUNDRETTE made well over its £650,000 budget domestically and over $2.5 million in the US. When it screened on 33 Laundrettes & Lovers: from storyboard to Billboard, 20 years of a British Film Company, by Working Title (London: Boxtree, 2003), p.30 Channel Four in 1987 it was a national event, gaining new viewers and repeats from its cult following and no small amount of controversy in the national tabloid press. It was the epitome of a Film Four project, typically British, controversial, well written, professionally but cheaply made with a very respectable box office return.

So what happened? Film Four continued its success throughout the 1980s and 1990s showcasing new British talent and enabling many films to be made that would have had trouble raising the finance - the company could afford the occasional miss if it had enough hits. It had huge hits in the 1990s with FOUR WEDDINGS AND A FUNERAL (1994) and TRAINSPOTTING (1996) in collaboration with Polygram, at the same time ensuring that films with smaller budgets continued to be made. By the end of the 1990s Film Four had become disassociated with its parent channel. It became a stand alone company and its budgets became bigger and bigger. Collaborations with the American majors failed to produce anything nearing a big hit and, the company stretched itself over too many expensive projects. It was wound up in its stand-alone form 2002 and rolled back into the parent channel³⁴.

Goldcrest

The script for CHARIOTS OF FIRE was passed around nearly every major film company before finally finding a backer in David Puttnam's company Enigma. Goldcrest Films, the company often given the credit for the film's success in fact only put up £20,000 in script development. For some reason however the trade press seized on Goldcrest as the film's main producer and when the film went into box office orbit the company got a huge amount of press attention. In reality Goldcrest's CEO Jake Eberts had described the script as "a real downer"35 but in the eyes of the press the company became the industry's saviour. Eberts did little to put the record straight, and in some ways Goldcrest can be seen as having some responsibility for the film's success in the way it managed to sell the North American rights to the film to Warner Brothers for a considerable sum. Warner went all out on marketing the film and it was a huge success.

CHARIOTS OF FIRE is a typical Goldcrest investment: a small risk, a frenzied auction for overseas rights, a huge box office return, critical acclaim and awards and a certain type of Englishness that couldn't be mimicked by the American studios. Eberts,

For a good account of Film Four's demise and a possible future for the industry see 'That Shrinking Feeling', by Geoffrey Macnab, Sight & Sound Vol.12 No.10, October 2002 pp.18-21

ironically a Canadian, led Goldcrest for 8 years with this modus operandi, striving to make British films with British cast and crew. His policy was to only commit the company to half the budget and to spread the costs by courting a distributor for the English speaking world rights before the films were finished. When the films were successful this worked like a dream and, as GANDHI and THE KILLING FIELDS followed CHARIOTS OF FIRE, the company triumphed through the early 1980s.

It couldn't last; by the mid 1980s Hollywood had cottoned on to the fact that quality drama was selling well to older audiences and it began to make its own rather than buying British films. Eberts left the company in 1984 and his successor James Lee announced a £75 million production schedule that hardly included any films with a British bent, the notable exception being ABSOLUTE BEGINNERS (1986)³⁶. The other films with which Goldcrest aimed to take on Hollywood were THE MISSION (1986) and REVOLUTION (1985). Goldcrest tried to maintain its reputation for nurturing talent by stepping back from the production process, unfortunately the directors of all three films could have done with a little reigning in as budgets and shooting schedules went out of control and by the time Goldcrest addressed the situation it was too late, ABSOLUTE BEGINNERS and REVOLUTION were laughably overblown and not even excessive marketing could recoup the budgets. THE KILLING FIELDS (1987) was an accomplished piece that at least broke even but could not compensate for losses elsewhere. On all three the company lost over £15 million. Goldcrest was sold in 1987 to Brent Walker primarily as the sales and distribution concern it is today, rather than as a working production company³⁷.

Palace Pictures

Palace is an interesting case study for the 1980s; a completely new kind of British film company. Setting up the company from an art cinema and a video shop, founders Nik Powell and Steve Woolley were the first in the UK to realise the potential of the new video markets for selling cult movies. Palace Video sold the type of films you couldn't get anywhere else, a mixture of foreign language product, American independents and music video. Amongst its first titles in 1982 were PINK FLAMINGOS, MEPHISTO, ERASERHEAD and a Blondie music video compilation.

Woolley and his team personalised the business of film acquisition, flying out to various film festivals to meet the filmmakers and persuade them that Palace was a company that understood their product and could sell it in the UK. In this way many friendships were established with new filmmakers who would go on to be successful in the future; the Coen brothers, Neil Jordan and Sam Raimi among them. It was Raimi's first feature THE EVIL DEAD (1982) that gave Palace its first major hit and led the company's move into theatrical distribution. They decided to release the film simultaneously on video and in cinemas. This outraged many established distributors and exhibitors who saw it as a move that would further the alarming decline in cinema audiences. In a way they were right, THE EVIL DEAD was shown at an elaborately staged preview screening in Scotland and did well in theatres but it was a massive retail hit selling vast numbers of video units to be the biggest title of the year³⁸. Palace had marketed the video perfectly and being labelled "the ultimate video nasty" by Mary Whitehouse helped it along in the youth market.

Similar distribution strategies were used for the next few releases including PARIS TEXAS (1984) and MERRY CHRISTMAS MR. LAWRENCE (1982). The company was so successful with unusual releases that other companies with more money began bidding for titles against them. An obvious response to this threat was to move into film production, thereby ensuring the distribution rights to any film Palace were involved in. The first feature from Palace Productions was A COMPANY OF WOLVES, an artful fantasy made by Neil Jordan who had known the Palace team since they distributed his debut feature ANGEL in 1982. THE COMPANY OF WOLVES received critical acclaim and was reasonably successful in the UK but was marketed as a straight horror movie in the all important North American market by Cannon and bombed dramatically³⁹. Things would get worse before they got better.

ABSOLUTE BEGINNERS looked like a sure fire hit on paper; a young cast, a cult novel and a soundtrack featuring David Bowie. In reality it could be said that the film had an inexperienced director, a muddled script, two unknown leads, over ambitious art direction and less than classic songs Palace spent £500,000 on promoting it⁴⁰ and unusually for the company they overdid it; the film could never live up to the expectation and it sank into an oblivion of bad reviews and consumer apathy. Luckily for Palace it had not been the sole production company and it made back its investment. Co – producer Goldcrest lost £3.5 million on the project by acting as completion guarantor.

There followed a period of intense production for Palace with 12 films completed by the end of the decade. Of these only two proved to be box office hits, MONA LISA and SCANDAL (1988). SCANDAL in particular can be seen as the high point for Palace where their strengths came together, a big budget project with a successful shoot, big box office and critical acclaim both in the UK and the US. Other films were less successful; HARDWARE (1990), SIESTA (1987), THE COURIER (1987) and BIG MAN (1989) sank without trace, whilst HIGH SPIRITS was a huge flop. SHAG (1987), an American co-production with Hemdale, despite legal arguments between the companies and an unfortunately high 15 certificate did quite well at the box office⁴¹.

By the end of the 1980s the Palace Group had stretched itself too thinly over too many unprofitable productions and too many minor business ventures and even failed to capitalise on changes in the video retail market resulting in a 50% drop in annual turnover. The end was in sight and by 1992 Palace would be no more despite having a final huge hit in THE CRYING GAME (1992). Throughout, Palace's main strength had been its distribution division, releasing many of the films that would define the decade in both British and world cinema.

BFI HANDBOOK CATEGORY

The BFI Handbook categories referred to in the database of films (column G)are the way that we have classified different kinds of British films over the years in the BFI Film and Television Handbook. We believe this kind of classification helps readers to understand the degree of 'Britishness' of the film and get a sense of its production background. The categories are defined as follows:

A = feature films where the cultural and financial impetus is from the UK and where the majority of personnel are British.

B = majority UK Co-productions. Films in which, although there are foreign partners, there is a UK cultural content and a significant amount of British finance and personnel.

C = minority UK co-productions. Foreign (non US) films in which there is a small UK involvement in finance and personnel.

D = American financed or part-financed films in the UK. Most titles have a UK cultural content.

E = American films with some British financial involvement.
